A GARDEN of HERBS

— CULTIVATION —

Herbs will thrive in poor soil with very little care. Generally the annuals require plenty of sunlight, air and warmth and not too much water. Gravelly, sandy soil make the best beds—soil must be sweet and occasionally limed.

Soil for window box of herbs may be prepared from one part compost—two parts sand—one part loam.

Perennial herbs require the same treatment as all other perennials in the garden; divide clumps every two or three years and cut back often.

For an early start sow seeds in a hot frame, otherwise outdoors in early Spring. Most herb seeds may be sown as late as June. Directions on proper sowing of the various seeds in this packet will be found stamped on the stake marker attached to each envelope. Use the stake to mark the plot in which the seed is sown by imbedding it in the center of the plot. Generally sow by simply pressing seed in soil just enough to cover over. Large seeds like coriander sow about twice deep in the ground of its size. When seedlings develop two to three leaves transplant to desired place in the garden. The best time to transplant is at sundown on a mild, windless day and plant about twelve inches apart. Keep ground moist until seedlings are well established.

All perennials in this packet are marked with a star * those not marked are annuals.

— HARVESTING —

Cut down leaf herbs just before they go to seed. Blossom herbs should be gathered just before the blossoms open. Seed herbs should be gathered just before they ripen and fall to the ground. Harvest on a warm day early in the morning.

— DRYING FOR USE —

The simplest method to dry herbs is to tie the herbs in bunches and clean them by hanging upside down and playing a gentle spray of water from the hose on them. Allow the water to drip freely and hang for a while in the warm sun where they may have the benefit of a gentle breeze. As soon as they are dry remove to a dry room with plenty of circulating air to hang until they are perfectly dry and brittle. Remove leaves from stems and crush with a rolling pin. Store the finished product in airtight jars for future use.
